Thinking of ways to earn money this summer? Are you planning on flipping burgers or making pizza again this year? Wouldn't you rather code?

Participate in Google Summer of Code 2008 with Joomla!

The Google Summer of Code program rescues talented student developers to do what they love -- write great code -- for participating open source projects, like Joomla!, in exchange for a $4,500 USD stipend. Not too shabby, huh?

In case you don't already know, Joomla! is an international awardwinning open source content management system deployed worldwide with more than 3.5 million downloads in the last year alone. If you participate with Joomla!, your work could have a positive impact on people all around the world. If you enjoy developing applications in PHP and you want to work with experienced developers using emerging technologies, consider submitting a Google SoC project with Joomla!.

Faculty and graduate students are invited to participate as mentors. It's a great way to share your knowledge and experience, and an excellent way to get involved with the Joomla! Project and core developers.

If you are interested, visit joomla.org/GSOC for more information on eligibility, guidelines, and how to get feedback on your project ideas.

Hurry! Google application period begins Monday, March 24, 2008 and ends Monday, March 31st at 5:00 PM PDT.
